VULTURE WATCHING TRAPPED DEER

The little doe trapped between a cliff and the waters of Lake Livingston in East Texas appears to be in relatively good health this morning. There was, however, a huge vulture perched in a dead tree just above the cliff.

George Russell of Huntsville, Texas, who discovered the plight of the deer yesterday, made several phone calls to Houston media but there was no response. The response of the newsroom at the "Houston Chronicle" was, "That sounds like a television story to me." The television stations said that they had no reporters available because of the weekend.

"I can't stand the thought of this precious little deer starving to death all alone at the bottom of the cliff with only a vulture to stand watch," said Russell.

"If I receive no help in trying to save her by noon today, I will have no choice but to call the game warden to come and kill her so that she doesn't have to suffer a long and painful death," he concluded.

Russell believes that only by focusing media attention on the plight of the beautiful creature will local authorities make an attempt to save her.

A boat is available to take reporters to the cliff site. It is only two minutes from the Russell lake house at the end of La Jolla Drive in Waterwood, Texas.

To make arrangements to visit the deer, call 936-891-5245 or 936-661-0382.
